

Dan Magnone stars as the very well known costumier to the Prince of Monte Carlo. It is 1750 and the theatrical troupe of Pfennig Halbfennig are waiting for the man with the most offensive accent in all of Europe to arrive. Excitement occurs when, finally towards the end of act II (by which time we are all flagging) that man with the deep voice Mr. Andrew Green appears on high. The women simply swoon at the manly resonances emanating from a someone who knows how to blow his own horn. They play roulette: the end.

Other notable portrayals include: Soprano Freya Turton whose performance was such that MUGSS deemed it necessary for her to have an off stage role in the next production (to this end she was offered Director - and, thank God, accepted); Chris Price as "man who has forgotten to take his medicine"; Laura Hill as "drunk" and Emily Dean as "old woman who knits". Joel Fisher's production has been described as "considerably shorter than THE GRAND DUKE usually is". So join MUGSS they brutally satirise their own year.

"The most beautiful pantomime dame I have ever seen" - Ian Field: Row F, Seat 38.

"I didn't quite follow the plot" - Paul O'Neill: Drunk and en-route to the toilets at crucial moments in the plot.

"The man who designed the the lighting must be quite the renaissance man." - Tegan Gilmore
